In nature, biocontrol is a regular occurrence, as bacteria and fungi "helpfully" outcompete other species for resources, subdue other microbes, and even perform other helpful acts. At times, however, the microorganisms deemed to be helping are not called by that name; they are simply called "predators." The term "biocontrol" was first used around 1915 by the American mycologist Erast Lee Sclintz when he used it to refer to the ability of mycorrhizal fungi to prevent the decline of crops planted in soil poor in plant nutrients. The term was taken up during the 1960s by entomologists and plant biologists, and at this time it applied to the use of insect predators on agricultural pests. The name was shortened to "biocontrol agent" during the 1970s and 1980s. The term "biocontrol agent" is most often used in the context of the biological control of plant-parasitic nematodes, and the pathogens and plant diseases they cause. From the 1950s to the 1980s, experimental trials were conducted to prove the efficacy of biocontrol products (usually fungi), and evaluations of agricultural crops for their benefit from entomopathogenic fungi was the primary focus. Consequently, the soil organisms used for biocontrol by the majority of researchers and industry were species from the major groups of fungi in the soil, with mycorrhizae being the most common group. Nonetheless, other organisms were widely studied during this time. Before the recent trends, the majority of the microorganisms used for biocontrol were classified as non-culturable, unclassified, or as a type of bacteria. The first cultivated biocontrol agent to be used in a commercial product was the bacterium Bacillus thuringiensis. Fungi and bacteria The most common purpose for the use of biocontrol agents is the practice of biological control. Biological control is described by the Food and Agriculture Organization and the World
