When SpaceX launched its Falcon Heavy rocket from a launch pad in Florida this weekend, it was the most powerful vehicle ever to leave Earth's atmosphere. It was a moment of stellar real estate. A showcase for Musk and SpaceX. The next days will be hard. After a launch, companies like SpaceX normally don't talk. They don't comment. They don't answer any questions about the launch. And they don't talk about what they're working on. Almost every launch is followed by unprecedented coverage of a rocket that few people have ever seen before. The launch may be a media event of historic proportions. But after the launch, the floodgates open. Companies start talking, and they talk about what they're going to do, and what they're going to make. In the days after a launch, SpaceX has talked a lot about the Dragon capsule, which it launched for the first time on Sunday. (It's essentially a big capsule that's not quite as big as a Boeing 747.) "The flight was spectacular and the vehicle appears to be in good health and was able to make some contacts while returning to Earth," SpaceX founder Elon Musk said in a statement on his website. "Understood some light towing in the orbit, which is encouraging, and re-established the main parachutes and heat shield went out fine," Musk said. "Smoke and exhaust appear minimal and not a major concern." What's significant about this launch is that it was the first of the Falcon Heavy. The Falcon Heavy is almost twice as powerful as the Falcon 9. It was a tall order for Musk. He's going to have to do it again and again. A Falcon Heavy launch from the Kennedy Space Center in Florida last September. Elon Musk/SpaceX via Reuters The Falcon Heavy is the rocket that SpaceX designed to be a powerful, reusable alternative to the powerful, reusable Saturn V rockets that the US space agency, NASA, used to send astronauts into space. The Falcon Heavy is basically three Falcon 9 rockets. Each one is 57 feet long. They are fueled, and they're ready
